The Promise of Narrative Change: Living the Why to Thrive Carson O. Mouser

The aroma of dark roasted coffee, porcelain cups clattering against saucers, the steam blowing from the espresso machine blanketed the whispered conversations of couples, threesomes, and foursomes sitting around tables scattered around the coffee shop miming a living room. The heat from the hot coffee warmed my hands as I brought the cup to my lips. “Hey,” my friend Tim said, “You’re an orphan.” “What?” I said, spilling a drop of coffee on the saucer. “What did you say?” “You’re an orphan. Both of your parents have died.” “Oh,” I said. Until that moment I had not thought about myself that way. After that moment, the only thing I could think about was what it meant to be an orphan. I was no longer somebody’s son. I was no longer a child. I was no longer a member of the younger generation. Now, I was a member of the older parental generation tasked with providing wisdom and encouragement to a younger generation whose lives were rapidly changing even as I was quickly preparing to enter the latter half of my own life.
